

The image shows four large characters: 'A', 'a', 'u', and 'X'. Each character is rendered in a dark, solid font. Below each character, its skeletal structure is shown in a lighter weight, consisting of thin lines that define the basic shape and proportions of the letter. For 'A', the skeleton shows the three main strokes. For 'a', it shows the bowl and the tail. For 'u', it shows the main curve and the vertical stem. For 'X', it shows the two intersecting diagonal strokes.

When the original Aaux was introduced several years ago, I intended to go back and expand the family to offer more versatility. Years went by before I was willing to pick it up again and invest the proper time into building a viable and useful recut. Just putting a new designation and tweaking a few glyphs here and there would not do the designer or the typeface justice; instead, I chose to redraw each glyph's skeleton from scratch for the four main subsets of the super family along with their italics. Each glyph across the super family is 'connected at the hip' with each style—each character carries the no frills, simple architecture that endeared so many users to it.

The new recut expands the family to an enormous 72 typefaces! The original has spawned Compressed, Condensed and Wide subsets—all with corresponding weights—for complete flexibility. Additionally, all of the original weight variants have all been incorporated within the OpenType shell: Small Caps and Old Style Figures are there along with new tabular figures, numerators and denominators, expanded f-ligatures and a complete Central European character set.

A large, dark, solid lowercase letter 'g' is shown. It has a classic, slightly stylized design with a rounded bowl and a curved tail that loops back under the bowl.
